Many people let an unhappy first experience with Photoshop keep them from achieving their full potential. Don't try to learn Photoshop on your own-you'll miss out on the power of Photoshop by never learning to use its full capabilities.

The first time I tried to do a simple job with Adobe Photoshop, I was in for a shock. I had watched Photoshop artists and digital editors create stunning images and visual effects almost effortlessly-or so it seemed to me. One of them invited me to try my hand with a simple Photoshop job. My assignment was to select an object and paint it. What could be simpler? An hour later, I was ready to give up. I was so frustrated that I thought it must have been simpler to paint the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel than to do what I was trying to do without Photoshop training.

The first time I tried to complete a simple job on Photoshop, I did everything wrong. When I was left to do it on my own, I found myself in deep water and I sank quickly. The people peering over my shoulder as they walked by didn't help. That's one of the tremendous benefits of online Photoshop training-no one is there peering over your shoulder all the time, unless you want someone to be there.

One of the things I like most about Photoshop training is the way it triggers my creativity. When I learn new ways to do things with Photoshop, I start making new connections and discoveries in every area of my life. If you've been using Photoshop for a few years, an advanced Photoshop training course will teach you all the tricks and secrets you haven't figured out by yourself.
